Recollections of a Veteran of Incidents of the War.

HOOKER, SUMNER AND KEARNY

President Lincoln Knew How to Sit a Horse-Grant the Greatest of Military Riders.

BY L. D. SALE.

It is fair to presume that every member of the Army of the Potomac who has had the good fortune to see the most excellent photo-engraving of the proposed equestrian statue of Major Gen. George B. McClellan in The Sunday Star of January 14 has felt his eyes moisten just a little and his heart pulsate just a trifle quicker.

"Here comes Little Mac!" Who of those who served under him has not heard the cry pass along the lines like an electric flash, whether on the march, at review or on the firing line? And who that has seen him gallop swiftly by at the head of his staff on his stoutly made brown gelding can ever forget him? "Little Mac!" To us old gray-headed duffers of 1906 the affectionate title bestowed upon him by his men recalls precious memories. The Army of the Potomac loyally served many commanders; some of them they liked passing well, but from McDowell to Grant not one of them possessed the affections of their men as did George Brinton McClellan. The testimonial to his services in the hour of supreme peril comes late, but the survivors of the Army of the Potomac, whom he led from Yorktown to Fair Oaks from Yorktown to Fair Oaks and from Fair Oaks to Antietam, are not inclined to indulge in carping criticism. The present is an era of good feeling, north, south, east and west. Let no man disturb it.

On Foot and Mounted.

McClellan on foot and on horseback seemed to be two different inuividuals. In stature about 5 feet 6 inches, but well set up and well proportioned, he did not impress one afoot as when mounted. He press one afoot as when mounted. He seemed to grow in the saddle, and he always rode at a rapid pace and like a centaur. As far as sticking on a horse's back is concerned, and having a good seat, Grant had no superior in the army; but he was not as imposing mounted as McClellan. In addition to having a symmetrical figure, McClellan possessed singularly handsome features, and, whether on foot or mounted, looked the soldier. I recall a scene which thousands of others may remember. It was after he had resumed command of the after he had resumed command of the army late in the summer of 1862. We were well on the way to Frederick before it became generally known that McClellan had been restored to us. Not a man in the ranks but was fagged from marching and fighting, and I am sure when the news came that we were to be led again by McClellan every mother's son stepped with a lighter heart. lighter heart.

Between Hyattstown and Frederick there suddenly broke upon our ears from the rear the shouts of men, which swelled in vol-ume as the minutes passed. Then the bands struck up a patriotic air, and we knew that "Little Mac" was coming. As he swept by in a cloud of dust, with cap in hand, the air was rent with cheers, caps flew high and no commander ever received a heartier welcome. The pathetic scene at parting after Antietam near Warrenton, Va., I will not attempt to describe. The men did their duty to his successors; they were too loyal to their country and its cause to do otherwise, but, singular as it may seem to some McClellan was never displaced in their affections.

Battle of Antietam.

Speaking of Antietam, it was my good fortune to see the elder Sumner lead his men on the field at that terrible crisis in the affairs of McClellan and the nation. when Hooker and Mansfield were carried from the field wounded, the latter mortally. Affairs were going badly with us. Jackson still held the confederate left wing in the west woods, Longstreet the center was nfederate right wing, while Burnside was still thundering on our left at the bridge held by Toombs. Sumner, a man above medium height, was mounted on a medium-sized sorrel gelding that looked altogether sized sorrel gelding that looked altogether too small for a man of his size. He asked questions right and left in a low tone of volce as to what federal troops were in his front. The old soldier had seen too much of war to be rattled at anything. Even after he had sent Sedgwick's division into the terrible west woods, where Jackson's men were lying in waiting for him, and was compelled to retire with frightful loss, the "Old Bull of the Woods" never lost his composure; but he probably thought in fourteen languages.

About sundown, after Pope had retired with his army to Centerville, I dismounted near the point where the Little River turnpike and the road to Centerville fork. Soon there reined up a few feet near me a sol-dierly looking man on a spirited iron gray e of about fifteen and a half hands, horse was very restless, and I noticed that his rider carried the reins of the bridle on the stump of one of his arms, with which he easily controlled him. This was Gen, Philip Kearny, then the ideal American sabreur, renowned for his feats against the savages of the far west, and a veteran of the Mexican war, in which he lost his arm. Two hours later there was a desperate fight near Chantilly in a fierce rainstorm. The next forenoon, while riding through the main street of Fairfax Court House, I passed an ambulance with a heavy escort of cavalry. One of the curtains of the vehicle flapped as I passed and I saw the deathly white hand of a man. On making inquiry I was told that the body of the man was that of Kearny. As I had not heard of his death I asked again of another cavalryman the same question and was told that the body was Stevens. Both generals were killed the same evening and their remains were being escorted to Wash-

Pope and McDowell. I saw Pope and McDowell ride side by side on to the bloody battlefield of Cedar Mountain, eleven miles southwest of Culpeper, after Banks had been defeated by Jackson. They were mounted on handsome bay geldings and each were imposing-looking men to my youthful eyes. Banks, with his lithe and erect figure and handsome face, looked well on a horse, and like Mc-Clellan, when mounted looked to be a much larger man than he really was. He was fine horseman. Hooker was not only the handsomest man, but the most imposing figure on horseback, barring Hancock, in the Army of the Potomac. He had a pink and white complexion, and large and hand-

President never lost an inch, and I have never seen a man with a better seat in the saddle than Mr. Lincoln, although I have seen more graceful figures on horseback. Mr. Lincoln had ridden the Illinois circuit for years before he was elected President, and naturally knew how to ride. A feature of Mr. Lincoln's presence, which excited the mirth and wonderment of the soldiers, was how he managed to keep the big hat in place, as it was perched on the back of his head. The horse McClellan rode while with the Army of the Potomac was much unlike the steed on which Artist McMonnies has placed him. He was the synonym of strength and endurance. Strong in the quarters, full in the barrel, well ribbed up and strong boned, he was fitted for the arduous duties of a war charger, and not specially adapted for parade. The late Gen. Henry V. Boynton is authority for the statement that the artist who modeled the horse on which Gen. George H. Thomas is mounted took for his subject the animal the general rode in his last campaigns. No horseman can find fault with Mr. McMonnles' animal, for it is certainly a magnifi-cent specimen of the equine species. As regards the criticism of the covering of the head of his subject, Mr. McMonnies is historically correct. My recollection is that McClellan always were the military cap of the period in which he served when com-mander of the Army of the Potomac.

best-known citizens, whose home is near Travilah, was the victim of an unfortunate gunning accident in North Carolina last Friday. While partridge hunting with Dr. Robert C. Warfield of this place and Rev. W. F. Locke, pastor of Mount Vernon M. E. Church, Washington, he was struck in the face by several shot from the guns of his companions. One shot entered his right eye, destroying the sight of that member, but the others did not penetrate the flesh. On Monday the injured eye was removed, such an operation being found necessary to such an operation being found in save the sight of the other.

No blame is attached to either Dr. Warfield or Mr. Locke, both of whom are much by the occurrence. The dogs distressed by the occurrence. The dogs stood a bird near Dr. Warfield and Mr.

Locke and between them and Mr. Hughes, who was about 150 yards distant. Mr. Hughes was in line with the probable direction the bird would take, and he was called to move to one side. Instead, however, he came directly toward his companions, who were unable to see him because of the thick growth. As the bird flew up both Dr. War-field and Mr. Lacke fired, with the result At first it was not thought that the in-
